ABSTRACT

The subdiscipline of women's history began in the 1960s. Both the feminist movement and the new study of social history contributed to the development of women's history. Because of these connections, women's history generally expounds a certain political viewpoint and focuses on a specific type of history. The women's history collection in the library of the National Archives and Records Administration (NARA) is small and concentrates on works that are relevant to NARA's record holdings. This pathfinder to 125 documents is organized into seven categories: bibliographies; reference works/biographical sources; journals; collections of primary materials; monographs and anthologies; archival research; and guides to archives. Monographs and anthologies are further subdivided thematically. The themes are: overviews; African-American women; family and children; revolutionary women; suffrage; temperance; theory; women and labor; women and reform; women and society; women and war; and women and the West. Some of the major themes and problems in women's history are conveyed through the descriptions of works. Each entry includes: author; title; publisher information; a short description/summary of the document; and Library of Congress call number. (MAS)

PATHFINDER FOR WOMEN'S HISTORY RESEARCH IN THE NATIONAL ARCHIVES AND RECORDS ADMINISTRATION LIBRARY

The subdiscipline of women's history began in the 1960s. Both the feminist movement and the new study of social history contributed to the development of women's history. Because of these connections, women's history generally expounds a certain political viewpoint and focuses on a specific type of history (social history is "history from below").

The women's history collection in the library of the National Archives and Records Administration (NARA) is small and concentrates on works that are relevant to NARA's record holdings. In fact, many of the works cite NARA record groups as sources (specifically the records of the Census Bureau, the Women's Bureau, the Children's Bureau, the Works Projects Administration, and the Freedman's Bureau).

This pathfinder is organized into seven categories: Bibliographies, Reference Works/Biographical Sources, Journals, Collections of Primary Material, Monographs and Anthologies, Archival Research, and Guides to Archives. Monographs and Anthologies is further subdivided thematically. In my descriptions of the works, especially the monographs, I have tried to convey some of the major themes and problems in women's history.

African-American Women

Genovese, Eugene D., Roll, Jordan, Roll: The World the Slaves Made, New York: Pantheon, 1972. The recent history of African-American women builds on Genovese's work and Herbert Gutman's The Black Family in Slavery and Freedom. Both Gutman and Genovese respond to the Moynihan Report of 1965 which called the prevalence of black female-headed families pathological and attributed the disintegration of black family life to slavery. Genovese and Gutman reconstruct the lives of slaves and the relationships between men, women, and their children on the plantation. Genovese also discusses women's lives in terms of work and household duties. He describes the master/slave relationship as paternalistic. E443 .G4

Giddings, Paula, When and Where I Enter: The Impact of Black Women on Race and Sex in America. New York: William Morrow, 1984. Thorough overview of African-American women's history. Gutman, Herbert G., The Black Family in Slavery and Freedom, 1750-1925. New York: Pantheon Books, 1976. Like Genovese's Roll, Jordan, Roll, this monograph responds to the Moynihan Report of 1965. Gutman argues for the endurance of black family life under slavery. He uses plantation records and the marriage records of the Freedman's Bureau (RG 105) to support his argument. Includes analysis of the lives of both male and female slaves.
